Investment Commentary

July was a violent month for financial markets. From the start of the month until its trough on the 29th, the South Korean stock market declined in value by almost 39%. Although it ended the month with a more modest 23% loss, this is a remarkable move for an entire country's stock market in just a few weeks. We expect this is the first stage in the bursting of the Artificial Intelligence investment bubble.

As discussed last month, we believe capital flow into AI-related investments has drained capital from many other areas of the market, leaving some unusually attractive investment opportunities. We are pleased to say movements in July appear to support this thesis, as many of the less fashionable investments, where we have positioned the fund, performed well as technology stocks were declining. Repsol, 3i Group, and Weir Group were all notable achievers in the month.

We made fewer portfolio adjustments in July than in June; nevertheless, we have made some changes. We further increased the fund's holdings of 3i Group in response to encouraging news that the discount retailer Action was returning to stronger growth. We also increased the fund's holding of the Italian shipbuilder Fincantieri. Like 3i, Fincantieri is a stock that has experienced some extreme price swings over recent quarters while, by contrast, its underlying business has shown consistent improvement. Fincantieri already has a well-stocked order book, which we anticipate will further benefit from increased European defence spending.
