Investment Commentary

The investment environment changed significantly in October.

On the geopolitical front, elections in both Israel and America have constrained the powers of President Trump and Prime Minister Netanyahu. We believe this could reduce some of the risk premium enjoyed by the energy sector. Accordingly, we have trimmed some of the fund's energy investments. Repsol, you will note, is no longer the fund's largest holding; we have also reduced the fund's holding in Marathon Petroleum and divested Valero Energy.

On the economic front, the artificial intelligence investment boom appears to be coming to an abrupt halt, due in part to investors' unwillingness to fund further capex and in part to the inability to supply power to many of the planned data centers. This change has led us to trim some of the fund's exposure to the mining sector, especially producers of industrial metals.

With perhaps the worst of the energy price shock behind us and a fading growth impulse from the AI sector, we suspect central banks may soon be compelled to halt or even reverse their recent round of interest rate hikes. For this reason, we have reallocated some of the funds raised from the energy and mining sectors to the European banking sector. We have invested the remainder in medical and consumer stocks, which fell out of favour during the AI boom. We have increased your holdings of Coloplast, a medical consumables manufacturer, and the drinks company Diageo.

In addition, we have established a slightly larger-than-normal cash position, which we plan to deploy as further opportunities arise from the disruption in the technology sector.
