

Comments from your Chief Investment Officer

August witnessed a resurgence of financial market volatility across all major asset classes – volatility being the preferred euphemism we fund managers use for negative returns. Once again, the concerns driving markets centred around inflation and the central bankers’ likely monetary policy response to it, together with growing geopolitical tensions between the US and China, specifically over Taiwan and the semiconductor industry.

As discussed previously, we believe much of the recent elevated inflation can be attributed to supply side disruption caused by the imposition and subsequent relaxation of lockdown. Accordingly, we expect this component of inflation to begin fading in the near future. There is, we suspect, a reluctance amongst policymakers to articulate any connection between economic lockdowns and the subsequent surge of inflation as, by implication, it would suggest the real cost of lockdown has been far higher than widely recognised. For this reason, in our view, volatility – in both directions – is likely to remain high in the near future as markets reassess the likely path of monetary policy. It is noteworthy that, while inflation remains a primary concern, the price of oil has fallen from over $120 per barrel in June to under $90 now. The price of natural gas, however, does remain somewhat worrying as an input cost to global industries worldwide.

In light of the growing tensions surrounding the semiconductor industry, together with concerns over inventory build-up, we have reduced your exposure to the semiconductor industry during the month. Specifically, we have reduced your holdings of both Nvidia and Advance Micro Devices. It has become evident that Nvidia’s graphic cards have had greater demand from the crypto mining industry than earlier assumed. That market has collapsed through 2022.

The Q2 2022 reporting season is almost through for your portfolio constituents: performance remains healthy with average annual income growth at 24.6% and operating margins at 30.6%. A quarter of your holdings has also raised their guidance for the remainder of the year.
