

Comments from your Chief Investment Officer

Toward the end of October, both the approaching U.S. Presidential election and the imposition of new lockdown restrictions across Europe began weighing on market sentiment. These new restrictions look set to materially curtail economic activity well into the new year. Early hopes of a simple V-shaped recovery are now untenable, the lockdown restrictions will now persist long enough to cause a significant re-shaping of economic activity. Optimists are talking of a great economic reset ushering in a green revolution while others are, understandably, concerned over a persistent recession with structurally high unemployment and associated fiscal deficits. It is worth noting both scenarios could happen simultaneously.

Your portfolio is already positioned to benefit from the transition from physical to virtual economy, nevertheless we have made some small adjustments to your holdings during October. Most notably we have trimmed your holdings of both Mastercard and Visa and made a small investment in the parcel deliver company Fedex. We believe your portfolio is well positioned to benefit from a further expansion in remote working and remote shopping.

Undoubtedly the outcome of Tuesday's U.S. Presidential election will dominate markets for the early part of November. Regardless of the outcome we expect the result will clear a path toward significant additional fiscal/monetary stimulus in the new year.
